General Banks and the Young Secesh.

At the time General Banks was in command of New Orleans, there resided in that city a young reprobate of a rebel, who had yet to learn the wisdom of silence.—The General sent for him, when the following conversation took place:

'Who are you?' said Gen. B.

'I am cousin to Gen. _____, of the Confederate army,' replied the young secesh.

'You have been using your tongue rather freely, young man.'

'I have, sir, and don't back down,' was the reply.

'Then you must either take the oath of allegiance or go to prison,' said the General to him in a severe tone.

'I don't feel much inclined for either,' replied the youthful rebel.

'Well, I'll give you three days to reflect on the matter.'

At the end of the three days, young secesh returned, and said to the General, 'I believe I'll take the oath.'

After the obligation had been complied with, he turned to the General and said, 'Well, I suppose we are now good Union friends.'

'Yes,' replied Gen. B., 'there is no reason why we should not be.'

'Well, General,' said the young scamp, with a grin on his countenance, as he rose to depart, 'didn't Stone-wall Jackson lick us most confoundedly?'

With a look of most confoundedly.
