they must reside in the capital, where living is expensive; men in their stations ought to keep a plentiful table, and entertain the best company and a good deal of it.
Lawyer, I do not see the necessity of their residing in the capital; nor is it expected from them merely as Officers, that they should entertain either the best, or the alternative of paying tobacco, or money, at the option of the planter, which you now urge as a proof of your disinterestedness, reasonable as it was, we extorted from you: you did not make the offer, till the Lawyers had publicly advertised to take 12/6 currency per 100 lb. in lieu of their tobacco fees: till then you had some hopes that a reconciliation between Officers and Lawyers might take place, and that they would still, perhaps, unite in defence of their joint interests.

* Ariel seems here to allude to the dreams of a certain politician, called by the first Citizen The wicked Minister.
I have heard that he has heretofore been sorely troubled with uneasy dreams; that he has frequently dreamt of falling from the top of the monument of London, and of fighting battles with his enemies; and that once waking in the transport of his fury, he broke a glass-tumbler instead of killing his antagonist.
