CORSICA, July 1. - O N the last assembly holden at Corti, and formed by the deputies of all the provinces, it has been resolved to drive the Brench commissioners of the natifal convention from this island, and to give orders to the peafants, enlifted in the service of the republic, to lay down their arms in the space of four days. All this has been executed, and our farmers returned cheerfully to their honies.

The constitutional bishop and his nephew have been taken into custody; all our priests and monks have refumed their functions; and fince that, we enjoy the ntmost tranquillity.

LEGHORN, July 18.

The beginning of last week a desperate engagement happened off the island of Corsica, between an Algerine frigate and one belonging to the French republic; they fought with the greatest bravery for five hours, when night parted them; the next morning, at break of day, the conflict was renewed with equal courage, and the most determined obstinacy on both sides, for upwards of nine glasses, great part of the time within piltol-shot of each other. The Algerines made several attempts to board, but were as often beat off with great slaughter; yet so daring and resolute were the pirates, that they ran their ship along side the French in spite of all resistance, and grappled them so fast, that every effort to get clear was in vain; the infidels immediately jumped on board, sword in hand, swearing bitterly, in several languages, they would conquer or die, neither would they give of take quarter-The republicans received them with great spirit and resolution, when a most dreadful carnage ensued, with swords, pistols, javelins and lances, till at last the French were overpowered, and obliged to Arike to those terrible barbarians; the pirates lost, in both rencounters upwards of 200 men, besides all their ossicers; the boatswain was the last who had the command; this fellow, although wounded in several parts of the body refused to quit the deck, and died as he was encouraging the rest to fight. The French mounted 30 guns, and the Algerines 28, besides patteraroes, and they were both in such a shattered condition, that it was next to an impossibility either of them could reach Algiers.

P. S. The Algerine captain was shot through the head in the heat of the action, as he was nailing the colours to the mast; and the first and second lieutenants, who were both his sons, shared the same fate soon after; it was also reported, that they both sunk the next day, and what remained of the crews were taken up by a Tunisian bark, and carried into Tunis.

PARIS, July 18.

Charlotte la Corde, who, according to her own words, rid the world of a monster, was tried yetterday for the murder of the friend of the people, by the revolutionary tribunal. Her countenance displayed heroic disdain, and her answers, by their boldness, struck every spectator with astonishment.

At the beginning of her trial, she thus addressed her judges-" I did not expect to appear before you-I always thought that I should be delivered up to the rage of the people, torn in pieces, and then my head, stuck on the top of a pike, would have preceded Marat on his state bed, to serve as a rallying point to Frenchmen, if there still are any worthy of that name. But, happen what will, if I have the honours of the guillotine, and my clay-cold remains are buried, they will foon have conferred upon them the honours of the Pantheon, and my memory will be more honoured in France than that of Judith in Bethulia." Sentence of death was pronounced upon this resolute woman, and she was executed in the evening. The exterminatrix of Marat, continued to display the same uncommon spirit of heroic sirmness and resolution to the last moment of her life. Being asked by her judges, who were her accomplices? The answered, "I have none-no person has prompted me to perform the good action I have done; and if people will but take pains to examine all the events preceding and subsequent to the death of Marat, they will easily be convinced that a true republican foul like mine, could solely be excited by her own impulse to free her country of its most dangerous enemy." Fauchet, the accused member of the convention, was afterwards confronted with her in court; his bewildered monastic look formed a most singular contrast ney to Paris, and the affaffination of Marat. In the second letter, directed to her father, she supplicates him not to give himself up to grief, not to shed tears at a death which did honour both to him and all hi family. She concludes by the following verse:

Le crime fait la honte, et non pas l'echafaud." " Crime begets difgrace, and not the scaffold."

GERMERSHEIM, July 23.

Yesterday the enemy made a fresh attempt to break through our lines. About fix o'clock in the morning, a feint was made upon our right wing. The enemy repulsed our advanced post behind the felled trees, took post upon Spiegel-bridge, and Bellheim, and were to numerous, that they could not be dislodged this day without giving battle. The same kind of attack was made by another column of the enemy, reinforced by their right wing, upon our troops in the

The enemy's chief forces extended from the mountains as far as the wood of Zeiskammer, at which latter they also attempted to form, having first beat back our advanced posts to between our redoubts; but here our artillery played brifkly upon the French, who. paid for their great resoluteness with considerable loss. Having stood two attacks of the carabineers of archduke Leopold and Kaiser, with the utmost gallantry, fo that the horses of our cavalry could hardly get over the heaps of their dead, they resolved to leave the pluin, and marched off under good cover, about two o'clock in the aiternoon, to support their chief attack upon our right wing. Here the most violent attack took place. The enemy's picked troops, their numerous artillery, and desperate courage, proved they were perfectly in earnest. But the steadiness of the Austrian and Prussian cavalry, supported by the infantry and a formidable cannonade, maintained its post after many repeated attacks, and rendered it impossible for the enemy to penetrate farther that day than to where they had repulsed all our advanced posts, on which spot they could take such a position as either to withdraw or give battle the next day.

The loss of the French is very considerable indeed, but cannot as yet be ascertained; but as they formed themselves every time amidst the case-shot of our heavy ordnance, they must have lost several thousand

On our part the regiment of carabineers suffered a great deal; they had upwards of 100 men killed, among whom was captain Benjowski; in other respects our loss is of no fignification, as the enemy's artillery had not the least effect upon us. This morning when the intelligence was sent off, the French were ranged in battle array, a pistol-shot from us; A strong cannonade has been heard all day long, but the refult still remains unknown.

July 26. Yesterday and this day the French made soveral attacks upon the two wings of our army, but thefe were to all appearance only false attacks to cover their retreat, for our out-posts have just sent word, that the French army is retreating with all possible

Extract of a letter from the army of general Wurmser, at Landau, July 23.

" Since the 19th, there have been continual skirmishes between the advanced posts, but yesterday very ferious action took place. The French, to the number of 40,000 made an attack on the right wing of our army, composed of Prussians, and who were with the figure which the resolute Charlotte Corde teries opening on the French, and the Austrian cavalry at first obliged to give way; but three masked batmade. Being asked, if Fauchet had nor introduced falling on them at the same time, they were routed

Machecoul, Fontenay, Chollet, Vezins, Viez, Mortagne, in fact over all Poitou, part of Saintonge and Anjou. It consists in all of 120,000 men, 80,000 of whom are armed with muskets. They have already a very numerous train of artillery. The whole army is divided into four corps, under the direction of a council, composed of forty persons. The principal leaders are Gaston, Bernard, de Marigny, the chevalier d'Antichamp, Delessart, Gathelineau, Laugreniere, Laroche, Jacquelin, Lescure, &c. There are among them none of the higher class of the

"I however remarked (says the writer of this letter) one cordon rouge (red ribbon), but I do not know his name.—Each of these four armies has a general in chief, with a corps of regular troops ever in activity, and is reinforced by the inhabitants of a certain number of parishes allotted for the service of each division, whenever any grand attack or vigorous defence is to be made. When they are preparing to march, the general orders a sufficient quantity of bread to be baked for four or five days; each pealant is ordered to take his share, which, with his musket, is all his baggage. You must observe, that they are not suffered to lay down their muskets for a moment, and that they hold them in their arms when they fleep. When any part of the country they occupy is threatened with an attack, the general who commands in that quarter immediately despatches advice to the general-council, and sends off couriers, who order the tocsin to be rung in all the parishes set apart for the particular service of that division; and so little secrecy and celerity is there in the operations of the republican generals, that the christian army is ever in a state of defence, when attacked.

"Their manœuvres are performed with the greatest skill. At the commencement of an attack they almost always fall back, in order to engage our troops to pursue them into the interior of their country, and then, on a fignal previously agreed on, made either on the top of a hill, or by shouts, their scattered army closes and envelopes ours, which ever finds itself extremely embarrassed in a country covered with wood and mountains, and where the artillery and cavalry are of little aid. They executed that manœuvre in the last action we had with them, on the 17th instant, in which we fullained a very confiderable lofs."

According to advices from Vienna, of the 24th past, the cabinets of the allied courts are bufily employed in a plan, the execution and adoption of which is to be the only and indispensable basis of a future peace with the French. A form of government will be prescribed to the French nation; namely, it will first be presented to the acceptance of the French princes, and respectable chiefs of the counter-revolution, who will be allowed to make their observations upon the same; and afterwards it will be laid before the neutral powers of durope, who are to be invited to a guarantee of the same; and then, and not before, it will be communicated to the French nation, accompanied by a manifesto, signifying, " That on their acceptance of that form of government depends the peace and hapher into the tribune of the convention?
