LORD BYRON'S CORSAIR," We have bitherto regarded the poem of the Corsair, by Lord Byron, as a work of imagination. It seems, however, that it is founded on fact, if we may rely on a statement in a publication entitled. "The Life, Writings, Opinions, & Times of the Right Hon. Lord Byron, &c. by a gentleman in the Greek Military service, and comrade of his Lordship;" and which has very recently appeared in London. Among an immense store of anecdotes, some of which were never before published, and all of them deeply interesting, which this work contains, the following of the Corsair possesses novelty:

Whilst Lord Byron was at Constantinople, a Venetian vessel anchored in the port, where a quarrel ensued between the crew and Turkish sailors, and end d in an affray. The Turks were worsted; but the whole population being ready to back them, the Venetians fled precipitately to their vessel, and got under weigh, unfortunately leaving their captain on shore. Assured of instant impalement if he fell into the hands of the Turks, he entered the residence of Lord Byron, whom he did not know even by sight, and requested his assistance to shelter him and put him in a way of rejoining his friends. There was such an undaunted courage and noble confidence in his manner, as instantly gained him the respect and esteem of his lardship, who promised to protect him at the risk of his life. The Turks however, had seen him ent r the house, and no time was to be lost in getting him out of it. A suit of female apparel belonging to a Greek slave, was procured, and the captain decorated with it; and sallying out thus disguised, met with no interruption, as it is the Turkish custom never to look at a female, but rather to turn away on meeting one in their route. Lord B. followed at a distance, hired a Greek boat into which they got; and ordered it to put them on board the British frigate. They were only just in time, for they had scarce left the hotel, before it was surrounded by the Turkish authorities. and searched from top to bottom, but the bird was flown.

Lord Byron threatened to complain to the British ambassador of the insult, and talked loudly; but it was only to stifle suspicion. The Venetian remained on board until the ship sailed with Lord B. and they left it together at the island of Zea. Here as they strolled together about the islands of the Archipelago, gratitude and friendship drew from the Venetian the whole of his most extraordinary history. He was the heir of a noble & powerful family, and had fallen in love with a young lady of another family, of equal rank, which however, as is too frequently the case in Italy, was at mortal enmity with his own. They often met at church, where for a long time their sole intercourse was confined to an exchange of glances, which soon convinced both of them that love was infinitely more powerful in their breasts than family feud. At length they contrived to exchange billets as well as glances, and the violence of their passions, ab well as the importunities of Course (for it was he himself!) prevailed on the blushing fair one to admit him into her balcony at midnight. Their love was for a time crowned with every success that the heart could wish for; but it was not so sected at they hoped and believed. The lind dy was engaged in marriage to a cousin, in whom since she first said Conrad, she could not bear the sight of. Jealousy is as quick aighted as
