iquatic savages with all becoming attention, collegard, if there should chance to be any regret on a set of extra large hooks, and shapped some rone yard and steel chain, an ax, a couple of clumbs, and an old his poon, m oldstion to our ordinary equip neats, and off we started. We throw out our anchor at a iff ebb tide, and took some thomping. Targe half con true, and took some manning large fish:—two of these weighed thirteen pounds—so you may judge. The real where welly, was about helf a mile from the island, and, pethaps, a mile from the Cannecticut shore. We no ted there, very quietly throwing out and hauling in, until the breaking of my line, stairs; and we accordingly prepared to give them a returner. A soft park clock upon one of our magnum hooks, forthwith engaged one of the gentleren in our service. We got him a ong side, and by dint of piercing, and thrust ing, and hanging, we accomplished a most exenough of the kind to keep us employed until near low water. By this time, the sharks had all cleared out, and black fish were biting again; the rock began to make its appearance above the water, and in a little while its hard hald head was entirely dry. Tim now prorowed ashore to get the jug, which strange to s y, we had left at the house. I assented to this proposition; first, because I began to feel the effects of the sun upon my tongue, and needed something to take, by way of medineeded something to take, by way of medi-cine; and secondly, because the tock was a favourite spot for a rod and recl, and famous for luck; so I took my traps, and a box of bait, and jumped upon my new station. Tim-made for the island.

Not many men would willingly have been left upon a little barren reef, that was covered by every flow of the tide, in the midst of a waste of waters, at such a distance from the shore, even with an assurance from a com-panion more to be depended upon than mine. to return immediately, and he by to take him off. But somehow or other, the excitement of my sport was so high, and the romance of the situation was so delightful, that I thought of situation was so delightful, that I thought of nothing else but the prosecution of my fun and the contemplation of the novelty and beauty of the scene. It was a mild, pleasant afternoon in harvest time. The sky was clear and pure. The sleep blue sound heaving all around me, was studded with craft of all deposits and discipled. scriptions and dimensions, from the dipping sail boat, to the rolling merchantman, sink ing and rising like sea-birds snorting with their white wings in the surge. The grain, and grass, on the neighbouring farms, were gold and green, and gracefully they bent obes sance to a gentle breathing southwester. Farther off, the high upland, and the distant coast, gave a dim relief to the prominent features of the landscape, and seemed the rich tures of the landscape, and seemed the rich but dusky frame of a brilliant fancy picture.

Then, how still it was! not a sound could be notice of my request. I entrepfed them, for lather and mother, a little girl I knew oace.

heard, except the occasional rustling of my own motion, and the water beating against the sides, or garging in the fissures of the rock, or except now and then the cry of a solitary macy seagull, who would come out of his way in the firmament, to see what I was do ing without a boat, all alone, in the middle of the sound; and who would hover, and cry, and chatter, and make two or three circling swoops and dashes at me, and then, after have to stop, and cry and swim sabore. ing satisfied his curiosity, glide away in search of some other fool to scream at-

I soon became halt indolent, and quite indifferent about fishing; so I stretched myself out, at full length, upon the rock, and gave nd flow, stilling smothering subjecting [--]t were better to die a thousand common deaths. This is one of the instances, in which it This is one of the instances, in which it must be admitted, salt water is not a pleasant subject of contemplation. However, the rock was not yet covered, and hope, blessed hope, stock faithfully by me. To beguile, it possible, the weary time, I put on a bait, and threw out for a fish. I was sooner successful than I could have wished to be, for hardly had my hop stock the water, before the how but than I could have wished to be, for barrily had my line struck the water, before the hook was swallowed, and my rod was bent with the dead hard pull of a twelve foot shark. I let him run about fifty yards, then recled up. He appeared not at all alarmed, and I could scarcely feel him bear up my fine hair line. He followed the puil gently and unresistingthat the set strainies were in waiting, down that the set strainies were in waiting, down is ide, and looked up into my face, not as if side, and looked up into my face, not as if alcal impudence, as though he perfectly understood the precarious nature of my situation. The conduct of my captive renewed and increased my alarm.—And well it might for the tide was now running over a corner of the rock behind me, and a small stream rush ed through a cleft, or fiscure by my side, an formed a puddle at my feet. I broke my hook out of the monster's mouth, and leaned upon my rod for support.

Where is Tim Titus?—I cried aloud,

Curse on the drunken vagabona! will be ne-

My ejaculations did no good. No Timothy appeared. It became evident, that I must prepare for drowning, or for action. The reef was completely covered and the water w5s above the soles of my feet. I was not much of a swimmer, and as to ever reaching the island, I could not even hope for that.—If lowever, there was no alternative, so d I till a necourage myself, by reflecting that nees to encourage myself, by reflecting that nees to encourage myself, by reflecting that neces sity was the mother of invention, and that desperation will sometimes ensure success. Besides, too, I considered and took comfort from the thought that I could wait for Tim, from the thought that I could wait for I may so long as I had a foot-hold, and then commit myself to the uncertain strength of my arms and legs for salvation. So I turned my bait box upside down, and mounting upon that endeavoured to comfort my spirits, and to be courageous, but submissive to my fate. I thought of death, and what it might bring with it, and tried to repent of the multiplied iniquities of my almost wasted life; but I found that that was no place for a sinner to settle his accounts. Wretched soul! pray 1

The water had now got above my ankles when to my inexpressible joy, I saw a sloop bending down towards me, with the intention of picking me up. No man can imagine what were the sensations of gratitude which filled my bosom at that moment.

When she got within a hundred vards of the reef, I sung out to the man at the helm to laff up, and he by, and lower the boat; but I had a combination of all kinds of feelings and emotions. The present, past, future, heaven, earth, my torture of my disappointment; may Goi re-ward your inhumanity. The crew answered my prayer with a coarse, loud laugh, and the cook asked me through a speaking trumpet of I was at afraid of catching cold?—The black rays!!

In an instant the waves around me were lashed into a froth and form. No soone was my old sporting friend drawn under the surface, than it was fought for by at least a dozen enormous combatants! The battle raged upon every side. High black fins rushed here, now there, and here now there, and lo g, strong tails scattered sleet and froth, and the brine was thrown up in jets, and eddied curled and fell and swell-on jets, and eddied, curled, and fell, and swell-ed, like a whirlpool to Hell-gate.

Of no longer duration, however, was this fishy tourney. It seemed soon to be discover-ed that the prize contended for, contained nothing edible but cheese and crackers, and no flesh, and as its mutilated fragments roso to the surface, the waves subsided into their former smooth condition. Not till then did I experience the real terrors of my situation. As I looked around me, to see what had become of the robbers, I counted one, two, three, yes up to twelve, successively of the largest sharks I ever saw, floating in a circle largest starks lever saw, floating in a circle-around me, tise divergent rays, all mathematically equi distant from the rick, and from each other; each perfectly motionicss, and with his gloating, flery ever fixed full and flerce upon me. Basilisks and rat le-snakes! how the fires of their ste dy eyes entered into my heart! I was the centre of a circle, whose raon were sharks! I was the undergoing or rather undergoing at which s sprung, or rather unchewed game, at which a nack of hunting sea dogs were making a dead.

There was one old fellow, that kent within sult, or to give instructions as to the time and mode of operation. Occasionally he would skull himself up towards me, and examine the condition of my flesh, and then again glide back, and rejoin the troupe, and flap his tail, and have another confabulation. The old ras-cal had, no doubt, been out into the highways and breways, and collected this company of his friends in i kin-fish, and insited them to supper. I must confess, that horribly as I felt, I could not help but think of a tea party, of demure old maids, sitting in a solemn circle, with their akinny hands in their laps, licking their expecting jus, while their hoslicking their expecting lips, while their hostess bustles about in the important functio & of her preparations. With what an eye, have I seen such appurtenances of homanity survey the location and adjustment of some especial condiment, which is about to be submitted to criticism and consumption.

My sensations began to be now most exquisite indeeds but I will not attempt to de-scribe them. I was neither but nor cold,
