The first object, to one not supplied with a good breed, will be to provide himself with such as may suit his circumstances.—
If he has the money at command to do so, he should purchase of the breed he may select a ram and a few ewes. From these he will raise all the young, and in a few years he will have a flock of the best full bred. But in the meantime, from the same run, and such ewes as he may already have, or may be able to buy, he may raise a flock of half bred, which will serve his purposes for the present.—These ewes he may get wherever a market presents, but generally for a considerable supply, we must look to the flocks which are brought to the large markets to be sold to the feedmust look to the flocks which are brought to the large markets to be sold to the feeders. The best selections should be made from these, and where it is possible the chosen ewes should be near the character of the ram to which they are to be bred.—This matter it will be found hard to control, because these lean sheep are generally Merino crosses, and we should not, in Maryland at least, select that breed for our purposes. But to get a supply of ewes, we must take the best that offer, and we may be able to get none but these.

The ewes being obtained, let them be kept from the ram till the first of October, and the lambs will then come the first of March, and during that month. Coming at this time they escape the rigors of a severe winter, and by the time they need it, the dam has a full flow of milk from the springing grass. They grow rapidly, and springing grass. They grow rapidly, and soon make up the loss of time, never hav-ing their growth checked by deficiency of ing their growth checked by deficiency of their proper nourishment.

The ram lambs should all be castrated when a few days old, and the tail cut off at an inch from the root. They mind the operation little when performed at this time, but great care should be taken in handling, lest they be bruised and injured in struggling. Let them be held firmly and quietly. They make better fat lambs if to be sold for such, for being castrated, and if to be kept for weathers, there is much less risk in the operation when so young.

The ewe lambs, we assume, are all to be The ewe lambs, we assume, are all to be kept for breeding. If not, select such as most resemble the sire, and keep them constantly growing. It is not uncommon with careless breeders to let these continue to run with the flock, and most of them will breed in the fall, to their great injury. They should be taken away when weaned in August, and kept entirely apart from it the ram until eighteen months old. They will then bring their first young at about two years of age. They should be put to a ram of the same breed as their sire. It might answer to out them to their sire, but might answer to put them to their sire, but it is only in cases where an individual pos-sesses certain excellencies in a higher sesses certain excellencies in a higher degree then they are usually met with, and is at the same time free from defects, that this kind of breeding would be advisable. When the first set of ewe lambs are bred, the ewes which were first purchased, have bred two years, and brought two sets of lambs. If the flock is now as large as the owner desires, the old ewes should be fattened and turned off. The lambs which will now come from the first set of young ewes will be three-fourths of the breed of the sire and grandsire. The ram lambs of this stock should be castrated, and the best of the ewe lambs selected for breeding. If, in the beginning, any ewes of the same best of the ewe lambs selected for breeding. If, in the beginning, any ewes of the same breed of the ram were obtained, their produce has been preserved and in course of time will constitute the whole flock. If no ewes of the breed of the rams have been obtained, the cross bred ewes will be bred to such rams as were first adopted, till the progeny cannot be distinguished from the full bloods. If the increase is too great for the convenience of the owner, it will give so much the better chance to select out the fluest, turning the others over to give so much the better chance to select out the finest, turning the others over to the butcher, or to some neighbor who may want them to breed from.

As to the breed of sheep to be selected, there will be difference of opinion as to which of those known as mutton sheep should be preferred. There can be no question in Maryland and the surrounding States, convenient to great meat markets, between these and the time wool breeds.— What is needed here first, is meat, and the stock that will supply this, and give a val-What is needed here first, is meat, and the stock that will supply this, and give a valuable return in wool, too, will be preferred.

Among the mutton sheep there are the long wools and short wools. Of the long wool breeds, the Leicester and Cotswald are most prominent. The latter are the largest, most handy, and produce most wool. They have in general less symn 6t y than the Leicesters, and probably do not mature quite so early. Both of these breeds make more fat in proportion to the lean, than some of the short wool breeds and the flesh is coarser in texture and not so well flavored. In England the price of mutton is graduated according to the mutton is graduated according to the hrpeds; so that although the long-wooled breeds will make the most pounds of meat portion to expense, the superior price of the meat of the short wool will make them quite as profitable. In this country the taste is not so discriminating, and it is for taste is not so discriminating, and the fonly of late years that we have made the distinction. Butchers now in their advertisements of good meat, appeal to the taste of the consumer in announcing a supplie of South Down mutter.
